King's Place

King's Place is a double, two and a half story Greek Revival house distinguished by a large center arch, through which passes King's Way. It was originally constructed between 1852 and 1856 by J. Howard King and John J. Olcott, Esq., son of Thomas Worth Olcott, a prominent Albany banker and philanthropists whose family owned the Ten Broeck Mansion for about 100 years prior to its donation to the Historical Association. The rehabilitation of King's Place brings its history full circle to reconnect with that of the Ten Broeck Mansion. The building will serve as the administrative headquarters for the Historical Association, which was previously headquartered at the Ten Broeck Mansion. This move will free up the Mansion's basement to become more interpretive museum space. The Ten Broeck Mansion is considered one of the crown jewels of Arbor Hill's reawakening of its arts, cultural and heritage scene and reconnecting it with North Swan Street is considered instrumental to the neighborhood's revitalization.
